THE GLASS-MAKERS

The secret of making glass passed down through the centuries from father to son, each family perpetuating and preserving their craft. In the days of the Guilds during the Renaissance the manufacture of glass was confined to small shops where each worker was a supreme craftsman in his trade. Many beautiful and delicate pieces of glassware that have been preserved by collectors and museums, came from just such kilns as depicted by an old time artist in this scene—"The Glass-Makers."

Here are shown the craftsmen, busy at their tasks. Their wives sit by, watching and gossiping with their men folks.

The men standing are blowers, who moulded the glass as it came, hot and soft from the furnace, into many delightful and intricate shapes through deft and skilful handling. The man sitting is the finisher, or "gaffer" as he was then known.

The locale of the picture is in Merrie England of the olden days, probably near or in the towns of Bristol or Nailsea, both noted for their glass manufactures.

The goblet held in the hand of the man in the foreground is doubtless a finished product of the shop, reminding one of the custom of the times to make wine goblets engraved with short verses or "toasts" which were drunk to the reigning beauties of the period.

Modern production methods have displaced the crude hand work of centuries ago, but the traditions of quality and beauty in glassware still hold true in the fullest degree of their meaning throughout the manufactories of The Fenton Art Glass Company. We trust you will find this picture an interesting memento of the development of a great industry.
